Araké arises from the urgency to research a sensitive aerial piece and to create a symbolic and abstract narrative from the plastic relationship between an aerial dancer and different type of ropes on stage.

The body in the situation of attempting to find a solution to entanglements in the air enters into a state of tension between the power of control and the acceptance of randomness . It faces a state of risk and the fear of really entangling, it is forced to make decisions in chaos, and this state in itself has already a scenic strength.

>>>>Scenic space:

The show is intimate and it can be brought both to theaters and to protected street contexts.

“I would like to bring to the stage a feminine character that is not afraid to acknowledge fragility and imperfection, aiming to face the unpredictability of an entanglement and to find its solution.

A body that solves the impossibility of expressing as it solves conflicts”

Intention

Sinopsis

In a world made of ropes, a woman preoccupied with her appearance entangles herself in the spider web of her unconsciousness. She explores the monstrosities of her inner self until she uncovers the tangles of everything she has become accustomed to keeping silent behind her desire to reflect the feminine standards of elegance. In the entanglements she finds paths and solutions and she learns how to express herself and unleash her silences through body movement.

Araké is a desire for authenticity, a praise for the discovery of possibilities hidden by limitations, a reminder to learn how to solve what seems inextricable and to embrace lights and shadows of the process.
